1. SURVEY AND STUDIED POPULATION

1.1. Survey overview

The University Institute for Public Opinion (IUDOP) of the Central American University José Simeon Cañas (UCA), with the support of Seattle International Foundation (SIF), held a comprehensive study of opinion from June 8 to June 30, 2019, which explored the socioeconomic conditions of the Salvadoran population, their assessment of the situation in the country and their expectations about the future of the economy, health, education, security and justice in El Salvador.

The instrument used in this opinion poll was organized in eight sections. The first of them compiled the general information of the interviewed persons, such as sex, age, religious affiliation, political party preferred and their opinions on the main problem of the country.

The second section inquired about the country's economic situation and access to employment. This part of the instrument collected the public opinion on topics like: the main problem of the economy, the country's economic situation and the opinion about those most affected and benefited from it; also, it explored expectations about the future economic situation of the country. Besides, this section also delved into the family's economic situation, perceptions of poverty and unemployment and the prices of the basic goods basket. Additionally, this section included a battery of questions that explored whether new household debts had been acquired during the past 12 months, if there had been migration of household members to look for other job opportunities, if there had been any household member who had been fired and if they had needed to close a family business due to acts of violence caused by gangs.

The population was also consulted on their level of agreement or disagreement with some statements related to the country's minimum wage, taxation, support for entrepreneurs, the pension fund administration system, and the extent to which they think that economic problems affect all people equally.

This section explored further into the employment situation of the people interviewed, if they are currently employed, their level of satisfaction with their jobs, the amount of time they invest on the way to their workplace and the amount of hours they work per day, the possibility of losing their job, the number of jobs they have had, and the age at which they started working. This section closed with two items that looked into the citizen's expectations about Nayib Bukele's presidential management in regard to economic matters.

The third section included citizen appraisals on country's public education. It inquired about what is considered the main problem of public education, the aspect they like the most and least about it, and people's perception on the future of the country's public education.

Besides, this section inquired about the educational level of the people who were interviewed, and if respondents had not completed their studies yet, they were asked the reason why, and the age at which they stopped studying; also, they were asked about their level of satisfaction with the educational level they stated they had at the moment of the interview and if their educational level is accordant with their current job, in case they had one.

Additionally, this survey explored if any person in the household had to suddenly drop out of school due to acts of violence caused by gangs; it also explored if someone in the household had had to leave an educational center because it was not possible to continue paying for it or because it was required that they started working.

This section also included a battery of questions that measured the level of agreement of the surveyed population with some statements regarding the relationship between public education and employment access, as well as their opinions over the delivery of shoes, uniforms and school supplies in order to improve education, the perception about public education and its response to the needs of the country, and if the school of the place where they live is considered a place for violence prevention. The section closes with two items that collect the citizen's expectations about Nayib Bukele's presidential management in the field of education.

The fourth section explored the opinions of Salvadorans about the public healthcare service the state provides, by consulting the main problem of public health, and the aspect the population likes the most and least about this service. This section included an item that explores perceptions about the future of the public healthcare service in the country and the first action taken in the household when someone in the family gets ill. Besides, it included a battery of questions concerning the type of access to the different healthcare services in the country and the assessment of the assistance received in these centers.

This section included some questions consulting if the people surveyed have stopped going to a doctor or a healthcare center due to an act of violence caused by gangs, or if they have avoided seeking medical attention because they think it is a waste of time.

A battery of this section was aimed to exploring the level of agreement of the people who participated in the survey on aspects such as: coverage, quality and care provided in the public health system. As in the two previous sections, this one also closed, among other questions, with the expectations about Nayib Bukele's presidential management of the public healthcare service.

The fifth section consisted of surveyed population assessments about security and justice in the country. It also inquired population's considerations about the main problem of citizen security in El Salvador, and their expectations for the future on this issue. A battery of questions examined the participants' perception of security, the victimization of a household member, the avoidance of commercial places due to crime, as well as common violence victimization, and victimization directly related to gangs.

A battery was designed for this section, with questions that intend to explore the level of confidence in pursuit, investigation, judging and rehab of criminals, performed by the different entities from the justice sector. Correspondingly, the survey also explored the satisfaction level of the citizens concerning the Police (PNC), Prosecutor General's Office, judges and the prison system; also, the surveyed participants evaluated the job done by each one of these entities.

This section also included another battery of statements that explore citizens' perception of: equality before the law, rights protection performed by the main security and justice entities, and support for the political regime.

This part closed with a section consulting the perspective about corruption in security and justice institutions, perceptions on impunity, citizen support for creating an international commission in order to investigate serious acts of corruption and organized crime, as well as the expectations related to citizen security with Nayib Bukele's administration.

The sixth section gathered three sets of questions intending to explore: first, the importance of public services for the population; secondly, the level of satisfaction with public services nationwide and with those services to which the respondents have access in the places they live; and in third place, the level of confidence that citizens confer upon these services.

The seventh part was a brief section that gathered items about the eagerness to migrate to another country and the reasons the respondent have to do so; besides the ideological self-positioning, and income level of the interviewees.

The last section included items related to the socio-economic conditions of the respondents and inquires about the family group composition, the type of electric lighting the household has, the modality of water supply, the type of sanitary service, the access to digital or motor connectivity devices, the type of tenure of the households and the materials these physical structures were build with.

1.2. Sample selection

The sampling procedure was designed in order to make the resulting sample truly reflect the entire Salvadoran adult population, accordingly with the population projections for 2019, provided by the VI Population and V Housing Census of 2007 from the General Directorate of Statistics and Census of the Ministry of Economy (Digestyc).

The total number of surveys to carry out, considering a 95% of reliability (z), a variance of 50% (p) and a sample error (e) of $\pm 2.76\%$, was 1,260 interviews, and it was established using the following formula designed for large or infinite populations:

$$n = \frac{z^2 pq}{e^2}$$

$$n = \frac{(1.96)^2 (0.50) (0.50)}{(0.02760837232)^2} = 1,260$$

Subsequently, the number of surveys that should be conducted in each of the 14 departments of the country was determined according to the amount of population in each of them, according to the population projections for 2019 stated by the VI Population census and V Housing census from 2007. For example, the Department of San Salvador concentrated 27.63% of the country population with ages of 18 years or more, so from the total of 1,260 interviews, 349 should be conducted in this department. Also, the Department of Morazán concentrated for this same year only 3.03% of the adult population of the country, which for the national sample would mean a total of 38 interviews. The details of the population distribution, according to the population projections for the year 2019, are shown in Table A.

With a sample of 1,260 surveys, and according to the distribution of urban and rural population of the country, a 68.6% of urban weight and a 31.4% of rural weight were assigned to the sample. The distribution of the adult population according to projections for 2019, as well as the sample of 1,260 surveys on a departmental basis with its own urban and rural distribution is shown in Table B.

The sample was selected through several stages, first choosing the proportional distribution of the population by departments (as detailed in Table A), and subsequently selecting the municipalities to be included, then the segments in urban areas and cantons in rural area within each municipality. Finally, households were selected within each segment or canton. Once it was determined the number of surveys that should be done in each department according to their population weight, it was established that 30 interviews would be conducted per municipality, based on an efficiency and effectiveness criterion for the information gathering strategy with a team of 13 interviewers. Then, municipalities were selected within each department.

The first step was establishing the number of municipalities needed to cover the total of surveys in each department, and then making a systematic selection of them. To do this, the municipalities of each department were listed in ascending order: that is, starting from the smallest to the largest in population in each department. For example, in the department of San Salvador, the list began with the municipality of El Paisnal which is the smallest (14,256 inhabitants) and ended up with the largest municipality, Soyapango, which has a population of 278,173 inhabitants.

The second step was to cumulatively add the populations of each listed municipality. Then, a population interval was obtained that would determine the municipalities that should be selected. In each department, this interval resulted from dividing the total amount of the population of each department, by the number of municipalities needed to complete the interviews for each of the departments.

The third step was to determine a starting point in order to select the municipalities within each department. In order to do this, the Microsoft Excel application was used to generate random numbers between 0 and 1. The random number obtained was multiplied by the total amount of population of the department, in order to determine the starting point of the systematic selection and the first municipality to be included in the sample.

Thus, continuing with the example of the department of San Salvador: a random number obtained (0.4678379946) was multiplied by the total population of the department (1,756,919), which corresponded to a value of 1,191,859. The municipality that comprehended this value on its cumulative sum was Apopa, therefore that municipality was the first selected. To choose the second municipality, the population interval that resulted from dividing the total amount of the population of the department (which in the case of San Salvador is 1,756,919) by the total of municipalities needed to complete the sample (which in San Salvador was 12 municipalities) was added to this value. In the case of San Salvador, the population interval was 146,410. Thus, the next municipality chosen was the one where the new figure was completed, and so on, until the number of municipalities desired for the department was completed. On the occasions when the number of interviews to be carried out in one department did not coincide with a number multiple of 30, an additional municipality was chosen to complete the necessary interviews in the department.

This same procedure was used until the number of municipalities required nationwide was completed.

Using this procedure, 12 municipalities were chosen in San Salvador following this population interval. The previous table, Table C, shows how the municipalities were selected. The second column shows the population of each municipality; the third column shows the cumulative population and the last column specifies the order in which the municipalities were chosen. The selected municipalities appear in shaded cells. As can be seen, when the sum of the interval exceeded the total population of the department, it was accumulated to start the procedure again, allowing the smaller municipalities at the top of the list to be chosen as well. In the cases in which the population interval was accumulated in a single municipality, the selection could be repeated until the sum of intervals was greater than the accumulated population for that municipality.

Once all of the municipalities were selected, the areas within each municipality that should be included in the sample were chosen. For this, two different procedures were carried out depending on the nature of the area of the municipality. For the urban areas, the municipality was divided into population segments based on the maps of the General Directorate of Statistics and Censuses (Digestyc); while in rural areas the cantons were designated as the population unit and they were listed to be chosen randomly.

On the other hand, for the selection of the sample by sex and age quotas, it was necessary to segment the population by sex, and in age ranges of 18 to 34 years and 35 years and over. In the same way, the percentage of representativeness that each one of them has in the population over 18 years at the national level was calculated, in order to distribute the sample (which in this case is 1,260 interviews) according to the weight they have in correspondence with the 2019 projections of the VI Population and V Housing census. This same procedure was performed in each of the 14 departments so that the sample was distributed according to each of the statistical weights of sex and age, in order to obtain a representative sample at the national level.

In the case of urban areas, the process of selecting the segments where the survey would be applied was systematic, with a random starting point, using the Digestyc maps. Each map of the municipalities shows an urban area of 2,000 to 15,000 homes and was divided into successively numbered segments following a spiral sequence. Each segment is a conglomerate of between 150 and 300 homes.

Once the maps were divided, a constant that allowed the selection of the segments was calculated. Responding to reasons of resources and distribution of personnel, it was established that in each segment selected, 10 interviews should be conducted. This way, in every urban area of each municipality, there should be a selection of the number of segments required to complete the amount of surveys corresponding to the urban area of the municipality. To determine the number of urban segments to be covered on each municipality, the number of surveys to be carried out in the urban area of each municipality was divided by 10 (which was the number of interviews to be done per segment).

Then, for each urban map, the number of segments of the municipality map was divided by the number of segments that were to be surveyed. The previous operation resulted in a figure that became a fixed ratio interval, according to which the segments were chosen based on a random starting point. For example, if the division of the total number of segments between the numbers of segments chosen resulted in 7, a number between 1 and 7 was randomly chosen, and from that number the segments were selected in an interval of every 7 segments. More specifically, if the number chosen randomly was 5, the segment with the same number was selected and from that number, 7 segments were added to the count resulting on the segment number 12, and so on until obtaining the number of segments stipulated for that municipality. In the selected urban segments, interviews were conducted, house by house.

In the case of rural areas, the procedure was much simpler. As mentioned previously, the cantons were determined as population selection units and it was stipulated to conduct 10 interviews per canton. Since there is no information on the distribution of the population in the cantons, the cantons in each municipality were simply listed and, based on the number of interviews to be carried out in the rural area of each municipality, a random selection was made to determine the cantons that would be included in the sample. The selection procedure of the segments in the urban area and the number of cantons in rural areas of each municipality in the country, allowed randomness and dispersion in the sample choosing, which ensured the population representativeness of the study.

Finally, in the last stage of sampling, the surveys were distributed based on sex and age quotas, according to the population parameters. This accomplished two purposes. First, ensuring a distribution of the sample surveyed equivalent to the distribution of the total population based on the fundamental variables of sex and age; and, secondly, removing personal selection criterion of the pollster when choosing the person that should be interviewed in each home visited. The final distribution of the surveys according to sex and age of the interviewees is shown in Table D.

Distribution of the adult population according to projections for 2019, and of the sample according to sex and age

Age	Female			Male			Total
	n	%	No. of surveys	n	%	No. of surveys	n	%	No. of surveys

35 years old and over	1,389,262	57.75%	370	1,314,776	56.51%	350	2,704,038	57.14%	720
Total	2,405,824	50.84%	641	2,326,495	49.16%	619	4,732,319	100%	1,260

The questionnaire was applied by systematic approximation to the households located in the segments and cantons selected of each of the chosen municipalities. The interviewers explained to the people addressed the objectives and the general theme of the survey. In each case, one person was interviewed per household, who met the sex and age characteristics previously stipulated and voluntarily agreed to answer the survey. When in one segment, a citizen rejected the request to answer the survey, pollsters looked for another person with the same age and sex characteristics established in the sample, within the same segment.

1.3. Information processing

Android devices were used to collect the survey data. The use of these devices had the objective of improving the processing and collection of information. One of the advantages of using this technology is that it reduces the probability of error, the rate of omission of response and the application's general duration, allowing to obtain additional time for the analysis of the data, since the information collected by the pollsters in the field is downloaded daily to a database server. This allowed the verification of the quantity and quality of the surveys that are being applied.

The information processing was done automatically. First, the synchronization process of the ludop database server was carried out and then the information was emptied in CSV format (comma-separated values). Subsequently, the information collected was transferred to the statistical program SPSS (Statistical Package for the Social Sciences), with the objective of carrying out with this computational package all the necessary analysis for the report's preparation, as well as the preparation of charts and graphs.

The final sample was subjected to a weighting process, the weighting variable being the area in which the interviewee resides, urban or rural, in order to make it closer to the real percentages of the population over 18 years in the country. This process was carried out using the population projections for 2019, of the VI Population and V Housing Census 2007 from Digestyc, part of the Ministry of Economy, which considers the urban and rural percentages in a national basis. Based on this, the weight of the urban and rural sample of the country, which is known as a heavy sample, was calculated.

To calculate the weighting factor of each sector, the ratio between the heavy sample and the actual sample of each zone was obtained with the next formula:

$$f = \frac{m_p}{m_r}$$

The weighting factor indicates the value of each survey carried out within the national sample, so each one was multiplied by the value corresponding to the area where it was conducted. In this way, a sample proportional to the number of inhabitants per urban and rural area was obtained. In several of the statistical procedures in which the weighting of variables is used, a replication weighting can be generated which simply rounds the fractional weights to the nearest whole number. This explains why, in some cases, the sum of the percentages that belong to the response options of some items may fluctuate one or more hundredths above or below 100%. The following figure illustrates the procedures developed in the data processing phase.

Iudop-UCA information processing flowchart

1.4. Final sample features

The sample obtained was 1,262 valid interviews, which were conducted in 37 municipalities of the 14 departments of the Republic. This sample has national representativeness and a sampling error of ± 0.02758648697 . This sampling error implies that the conclusions derived from the study in the population are representative at a national basis, and that statistics can fluctuate, at most, 2.76 points above or below the real values of the population parameters. This allows inferences and generalizations with a low margin of error, and therefore, with greater precision. From this national sample, 49.1% of respondents were male and 50.9% were female. On the other hand, 68.6% declared they reside in the urban area, and 31.4% said they live in the rural area of the country.

Finally, the departments were grouped into five regions: western region (Ahuachapán, Santa Ana and Sonsonate), central region (La Libertad, Chalatenango and the rural area of San Salvador), metropolitan region (urban area of San Salvador and urban area of Antiguo Cuscatlán and Santa Tecla), paracentral region (Cuscatlán, Cabañas, San Vicente and La Paz) and eastern region (Usulután, San Miguel, Morazán and La Unión).

National sampling procedure
Multi-stage sampling, with department, gender and age ranges quotas. Random selection of municipalities, segments, cantons and households. 37 municipalities out of the 14 departments of the republic were visited, according to a distribution proportional to the population size, established by geographical segments.

National sampling error
 $\pm 2.76\%$

Reliability level

Survey method
Face to face interview, conducted during household visits.

Period of completion
From June 8 to June 30, 2019

SURVEY ON SOCIOECONOMIC CONDITIONS AND NEEDS OF THE SALVADORAN POPULATION
June 2019

Good day, I work for the University Institute for Public Opinion at the UCA, and we are interested in your opinion on different topics related to employment, healthcare, education, security, and justice in the country. We would like to ask you some questions, which shouldn't take too much time. This survey is totally anonymous. We will not ask you for your name or your address. Please feel free to answer honestly; there are no right or wrong, or good or bad answers; we are only interested in knowing your opinion. Thank you.
